Hope never for a moment deserted me, and although I fully realized my financial condition, I set at once to work to devise a plan for mending my fortune, which had disappeared before my eyes. The Steamship Company disclaimed being responsible for my baggage, and informed me that all personal property was shipped at the owner s risk unless insured against accident before leaving port. My trunks contained not only my wardrobe, but letters of introduction, newspaper notices, steel plates, lithographs, and advertizing bills, as well as many other necessary accompaniments to my professional career which it was impossible to replace. Many a person less resolute, in my position, would have succumbed at the prospect before them and given up the fight. With me the exigencies of the case only instilled new courage into a nature that had become...
